Insightful reviews

Kathleen: I learned how others rose above poverty and prejudice and still be proud of where they came from.

Liliana Salas: As a migrant child myself, I identify with this book a lot! The descriptions are so vivid, that it reminded me of my own childhood and I pretty much cried throughout the book. It was also very empowering!

Roger Bailey: This book does a really good job of describing the misery that migrant farmworkers live in, but I was a bit disappointed. There is no description of any fightback that the workers engage in against their oppression. They seem to just accept their conditions of life as if it is the only way that things can be. That is, they all accept it except for the author. In fact, the whole point of the book seems to be that the author was determined to get good grades in school and to get the best education she could and as a result she got out of the migrant farmworker life. Surely her family and fellow workers must have some resentment over how they are treated, but there are no more than hints about that. I was left with the uneasy feeling that the author wanted to brag about herself more than anything else. Nevertheless, she does do a very good job of depicting the daily lives of some of the most oppressed working people in North America.

Eric Bingham: I needed to learn this booklet for a faculty class. It wasn't awful, yet i used to be frustrated through the consistent repetition, contradictions, and the "woe is me" writing kind of the author. She's constantly whining approximately how undesirable her existence is, and the way no one cared approximately her or payed cognizance to her, yet then she turns round a couple of pages later and talks approximately how she is familiar with she was once loved, and her relations sacrificed rather a lot for her. possibly its simply because I had simply entire examining The Glass Castle, yet I felt like shouting, "Would you surrender your whining! there are numerous humans available in the market that experience it much worse than you do!" Anyway, this can be not really a publication i might suggest until the subject is very interesting to you.

Luanne: The content material of this publication jogged my memory a little Glass Castle. I had a
