Thurston Hunger: Such economical writing, after the blow-out of "Beijing Coma" (that is I read it afterwards, he published it before). In general morphing village tales into 21st century fiction almost always works for me, especially when the author eschews any simplistic notion of "the old ways are best."

The sky burial, certainly lingers for me. As does the greed of the artisan's spouse in the crown, and the unsexiness of the reincarnated holy (wo)man and the rites that she must endure. I get the feeling that the theme here is sacrifice, non trivial and likely unnecessary, but sort of thrust upon the denizens of these stories, as likely the destruction of their culture will follow next. Death just feels more present in many of these stories than in "modern" American life. Like yak butter.

Tibet tripping, I think Jian is more honorific than some may say. I think the culture he encounters beguiles him, as it did me. But both the author and I are aware that we are only visitor/voyeurs here, I suspect that is why cameras are such a prominent aspect of this short, but rewarding, series of stories.

Greg: You can smell the air and taste the dirt of Tibet in this tiny, powerful collection of five shorts. Just about as gorgeous as direct writing can be.

Leif Erik: Lessons learned: Tibet has a number of difficulties that bumper decal and 'enlightened' celebrities will not be going to solve. This is a mild ebook (five very brief stories) that ranks excessive in my pantheon of all-time miserable work. one of many topics in each tale is how the elevation makes pondering a tricky and painful activity; an apt metaphor for what passes for debate in this subject.
